Re: Kindle DX

Dear Mr. Goldstein:

Thank you for your letter of May 7, 2009, to President Tilghman, which was referred to me. I have reviewed your letter with staff in our office of Information Technology and would like to offer the following clarifications.

Princeton University has no control over or input into the design of Amazon's Kindle DX. To the extent that your concern relates to the design and features of the Kindle DX, discussions in that regard need to be with Amazon directly.

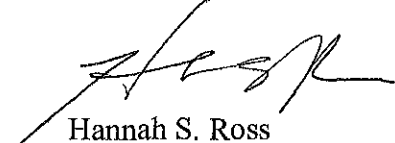

To the extent that you have a concern about the accessibility of Princeton University course materials through Kindle DX, I hope the following information will be of assistance. Princeton is committed to ensuring equal access to students with disabilities, in accordance with federal and state law, and makes course materials available in appropriate formats and/or media for students. Princeton plans to utilize the Kindle DX on a trial basis in three courses during fall semester 2009. The expected student enrollment for these three courses is a total of 40 students. Of particular significance to your apparent concern, the pilot program is structured to enable any student who does not wish to use a Kindle DX to opt out and receive the materials in another format.

The materials that will be provided through the Kindle DX are primarily those materials usually made available through what are known as library "reserves," which are sometimes printed copies and sometimes electronic documents. Just as we make library reserves accessible to students with a disability now, we would do so for any student with a disability who enrolled in one of the pilot courses for next fall.
